“ My Dad (Ira Cavallo) and I knew Bill well. He was always sitting in the lobby of The Heritage of Sandy Plains ready to open the door for me when I would get there to have dinner with my Dad each night. He always told me what his charge was going to be for opening the door and I always told him to put it on my Dad's tab. To which Bill would add that he was only kidding about charging me.

Another memory that I have is when Bill would recount his days as an iceman and how he would carry 150 pound blocks of ice on his shoulder while helping his Dad deliver ice.

Bill also liked when I would wear my "Navy" t-shirt and my "Ford" t-shirt. Bill, as was my Dad, was in the Navy and the Ford plant was in Detroit where he lived.

One more memory....Bill enjoyed telling me the story of when his Mom, brother(s?) and he would go visit his Grandmother and Weaser, his Grandma's dog. Weaser would somehow know about 20 minutes before they arrived and would start getting excited about getting to see Bill because he always took Weaser on a long walk. He said that his Grandma would always say that she knew when Mary and the boys were on their way.

The best part of all of Bill's stories was when he would say that I was helping him remember his old memories. Things that he hadn't thought about for years. And then he always got a big smile on his face!

Rest in peace, Mr. Bill. I miss you.

As Always.....
